I have just received your messages, and I am concerned at the following:

1. If I am supposed to have typed these things, the typing is much too perfect and uniform, (and also not done on my machine).

2. If the source is supposed to have typed them, and given them to me, he has obviously had a long period of training in your headquarters to have such a mastery of your style, grammar, and general phraseology, not to mention form.

For these reasons I hesitate to turn them over to him right away. Accordingly, I shall move into this slowly. There is another advantage in this. He has always been absolutely insistent on knowing identities - in contrast to his attitude to ~~take~~ others. I suspect he may not take the material unless he knows the source, but I shall, of course, explore his receptiveness.

I'll be in touch with you shortly.
